FEED, NOT HEAT MAY BE THE TROUBLE

Feed problems, not heat problems, may be the trouble when the "summer slump" in milk production comes.

W. S. Griffith, VPI dairy specialist, says that when cows do not get enough feed, as is generally true during the hot summer months in southern states milk production may drop markedly. The easiest way to explain this situation is to say that cows just don't like hot weather. However, Griffict, says this is not the case.

A recent report from the Holstein-Friesian Association of America, indicates that even in the tropical desert of Israel, cows do quite well if feed is adequate. Dr. Solomon Bloom of the Agricultural Research Station at Rehovot has said that Holsteins do very well under Israel's climatic conditions. He says, that from Galilee down to the southern desert where the biblical Abraham tended his flocks, land which has produced nothing for 2,000 years is now turning wholesome milk in tank truck amounts. Holsteins, many of them descendents of animals imported from the United States, are playing a major role in the development of this new dairy area. Dr. Bloom reported that with good management many of the black and white herds are averaging well over 12,000 pounds of milk per year, and despite the intense heat several individual cows have made annual records of close to 20,000 pounds of milk.

Griffith says Virginia dairymen would do well to take this information to heart. If providing adequate feed will maintain good production, "then that is exactly what we should be doing." Many high-producing Dairy Herd Improvement Association herds have developed excellent summer feeding programs and no longer have a summer slump in milk production, he says.

ROTATION AFFECTS BLACKSHANK LOSSES IN FLUE-CURED LEAF

Flue-cured tobacco should not be grown on soils infested with black shank disease in a one or two-year rotation.

Use of resistant varieties in a two-year rotation may be considered if the initial infestation is low, and considerable care is taken to prevent recontamination.

And it takes more than four years between tobacco crops to free the land of the black shank fungus.

These were the findings reported by E. M. Matthews, Wybe Kroontje, and R. G. Henderson, of Virginia Agricultural Experiment Station, at a recent meeting of the American Society of Agronomy at Purdue University.

The scientists have been investigating the effect of the length of rotation on black shank losses in flue-cured tobacco. They explained that the disease was discovered in Virginia in 1939. It had been observed in Kentucky in 1935, and in North Carolina as early as 1931. Since then it has become widespread and is one of the most destructive diseases of tobacco.

By far the most effective control measure at present is the use of resistant varieties and long rotations. As the yielding ability and leaf quality of resistant varieties are, in general, inferior to those of the non-resistant varieties, more effort is being made to reduce the incidence of the disease through rotations.

In the Virginia tests, five flue-cured tobacco varieties with varying degrees of resistance were grown on a black shank infested soil in one-, two-, and three-year rotations.

In the one-year rotation (continuous cropping) the disease spread rapidly and the annual losses because of it increased during the study. In the two-year rotation, losses also increased, but the rate of increase was less than in the one-year rotation. In the three-year rotation, the incidence of black shank was reduced from that of the first year of the test. The black shank organism still remained in the soil, however, even when a four-year period elapsed between tobacco crops.

'STEAMING UP' SEEMS OF LITTLE VALUE IN FEEDING DAIRY COW

A method of preparing a dairy cow for lactation known as 'steaming up' seems to be of little value, report dairy scientists at VPI.

In the steaming-up procedure, the cow receives grain for about 6 weeks before the expected calving date with the allotment being increased weekly. In the last week of the dry period the cow receives grain equal to 75% of her estimated grains needs for early lactation.

Recent work has shown that this practice apparently offers no distinct advantages as a method of feeding the dry cow. At the Illinois Experiment Station the feeding of from 4 to 12 pounds of grain per head daily for a period of 40 to 42 days before expected calving did not significantly increase the yield of fat-corrected milk for the first 84 days of lactation. The incidence or severity of udder congestion was not materially increased by the heavy grain feeding.

In a New York study, 3 groups of cows were used over a 2-year period to study the effect of feeding no grain, 6 pounds daily, and 13 pounds daily during an 8-week dry period, on the severity of udder congestion. All cows were fed silage and hay. The cows received 10 pounds of grain on the day after calving and the amount was increased one pound daily until they received the amount of grain warranted by their production. In their study level of grain feeding during the dry period had little effect on severity of udder edema at calving; heavy grain given immediately after calving did not seem to increase edema; high producing cows seemed to have more udder congestion than low producers; udder congestion was no worse in fat cows than in thin ones; and the trouble seemed to be inherited since cows tended to have the same amount of edema year after year regardless of the type and amount of feed eaten.

VPI specialists say it seems that the important point is to have the cow in good condition (not too fat) at calving time regardless of feeding.

FAIRY RING MAY CAUSE TROUBLE IN LAWNS

A malady fancifully known as "fairy ring" is causing trouble in some Virginia lawns, report plant pathologists at VPI.

Fairy ring is caused by a soil inhabiting fungus which grows in a circular manner. The part of the fungus on the inner side of the circle continually dies off as the fungus grows outward. The condition starts with a small circular area that enlarges by one or two feet every year until a round area of 20 to 30 feet in diameter may develop.
